AIA is striving to see Christ-followers on every team in every sport in every nation through helping athletes take their passion, faith and sport to new places giving new meaning to being a missionary.

We may not win another game....

"We may not win another game this year, and I may be a horrible coach," Baylor coach Scott Drew said, "but if any of these guys leave without knowing Christ, that will be the real loss."

"Winning the game of life is a lot more rewarding than a 40-minute basketball game that's so temporary," he said. "To have an opportunity to help be a part of an impact on a young person's life is the best feeling."

Coach Drew and a team of folks who love, care for, and coach the Baylor men's basketball team witnessed five players give their lives to Christ and publicly proclaim their faith through baptism! They have been serving with the team for years, seeing a victory here or there and patiently impacting lives by living out their faith. This year, God has chosen to put them in the spotlight.

AIA staff had the privilege of being involved with the team as well. In one quote, Foxsports.com shared that one of the players told a chaplain "he was miserable and didn't want to live according to his own plan anymore. A summer trip with the Christian basketball organization Athletes in Action had planted the idea of "playing for God."
